About Custom House

Built in 1770, the Custom House served as both the civic office and private residence of Henry Packer Dering, Custom Master for the federal port of Sag Harbor following the ratification of the Constitution. As an officer of the federal government, Dering successfully implemented Treasury Secretary Alexander Hamilton's new system of federal taxation, while also accommodating the needs of local merchants. The commerce regulated by the Custom House transformed Sag Harbor into a sophisticated cosmopolitan port, helped stabilize the economy of the fledgling nation, and allowed local residents to see themselves not just as New Yorkers, but as citizens of the United States. The Custom House stands today as one of the oldest surviving custom houses in the country.
